

I urge the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) to oppose any changes to current indecency standards for television and radio broadcasts on public airwaves. Relaxing the standards would be a disservice to the American families who use the public airwaves as designed to inform, educate and entertain. With all the “talk” these days about wanting to protect our children, the FCC should face an easy decision in maintaining the current standards, and rejecting grossly irresponsible public programming that includes expletives and nudity from all FCC-licensed stations.
